

Figure 8: The three elements of a well-structured conclusion. Description: three key things to include in the final slide in the presentation; as with the introductory slide, an anecdote is often a welcome addition. Explanation: the last slide has special weight and should be given special attention; the anecdote should reiterate the major message of the paper in a way that creates smiles and is easy to remember. Implication: the final impression of the presentation should be a carefully constructed slide that leaves the audience with a lasting idea of the major points that the presenter wants to get across; emphasizing these major points at the end of the presentation helps ensure that the audience actually remembers them.